

PLAGIARISM SCAN REPORT

 0% Plagiarised	 100% Unique	Date 2022-10-11
		Words 525
		Characters 3285

Content Checked For Plagiarism

- There are laws in a society or community. People who live under a government are required to abide by rules. Rules are essential for ensuring that families and citizens can live happy, secure lives. The community will be more harmonious, civil behaviour will be maintained, and rules will help everyone stay organised. There are other reasons why rules are necessary, even within these categories.
- Though it could seem that rules are disliked because they are seen as restraints, rules are actually necessary for the organisation of life. To live and conduct business with one another, people will always require rules and regulations. Even just a sport without rules would be chaotic, so try to picture it. They must abide by the rules of the game they are playing in order for it to not be unfair. Additionally, everything in our lives should be governed by laws to prevent chaos and unfairness. Most people will likely act unjustly if there aren't any regulations, and everybody is free to do anything they want. To get along and treat one another with respect, we need rules.
- People benefit from rules in many areas of life. And first foremost, they make it possible for people to properly manage every task, from housework to more complex matters like, for instance, the operation of an entire nation. Rules are particular behavioural patterns that ensure a controlled circulation of all processes. A well-established set of laws aids humanity in avoiding chaos and other issues that may be brought on by a lack of rules. Laws establish what is right and wrong. We have rules to abide by in many areas of life. They enable us to carry out a number of tasks. People can engage, cooperate, and advance world progress thanks to norms. Dietary guidelines can aid in the prevention of health issues.
Why do we have rules?
- They are component parts of the system that affect the sustained and peaceful advancement of people and the world. Regulations are possible because society, not simply a bunch of people, exists. Ancient people used these straightforward procedures to order their lives. Rules sparked the emergence of civilisation, helped with the advancement of nations, technology, and education, among other things. People can do everything, but their intentions and deeds could injure other people in the community. The goals and aspirations of certain people may occasionally conflict with the interests of other people. Conflicts and major misunderstandings may result from it.
- Apart from laws, there needs to be defined moral guidelines for individuals to follow in in order for them to understand how to act appropriately in such circumstances. Before there were laws or written regulations, people used to go to the most knowledgeable person in their society to settle disagreements. He carefully listened to them and addressed their issues in turn. Then he suggested that they talk and seek the best course of action. Elders were respected, and people never questioned their advice. A person can better comprehend what is strictly prohibited and what is permissible under specific conditions by understanding the norms of behavior. These are the rules that place restrictions.

Matched Source

No plagiarism found